

Reading Without Eye Movement

Rapid serial visual presentation removes the need for the eye to move across a line of text. Each word appears at a fixed point. This eliminates saccades entirely, which accounts for a large share of reading time. However the technique also removes the ability to regress, that is to look back at a word already passed. Regression is not a bad habit but a genuine error correction mechanism used constantly by fluent readers. Removing it measurably lowers comprehension on difficult material.